Under Wisconsin’s criminal statutes, defendants may assert specific defenses to criminal liability, including adequate provocation or self-defense. In some cases, defendants have asserted these defenses based on the gender or sexual identity of the victim, often called the “gay panic” or “trans panic” defense. This perpetuates the myth that LGBTQ people are inherently dangerous and places blame on the victim, rather than the perpetrator. LRB-2490 eliminates the so-called gay and/or trans panic defenses in Wisconsin, stating that defendants cannot assert adequate provocation or self-defense if the criminal act resulted from the discovery of, knowledge of, or potential disclosure of the victim’s gender identity or expression or sexual orientation.
