ICYMI: Tony Evers' Tax Hikes Taking Center Stage in Governor's Race

[Madison, Wis.] – On Tuesday, Scott Walker's campaign released a statewide TV ad parodying the 1970s "The Electric Company" as Tony Evers' tax hikes take center stage in the race for governor. The ad spotlights Evers' call to raise property, income and gas taxes, and continues the case against Evers' record of siding with big government interests over Wisconsin families.

Scott Walker's bold leadership is moving Wisconsin forward by lowering the tax burden on hard-working families while also investing in our shared priorities – that is how we keep Wisconsin working for generations to come.

... Walker, in a new television ad, hearkened back to a children's show that was popular when he was in elementary school to say if elected Evers would raise income, property and gas taxes. Evers hasn't ruled out tax increases as he promises a more equitable tax structure that benefits the middle class. ...

The new Walker ad goes back even further, mimicking a skit from the PBS show "The Electric Company" that ran from 1971 to 1977. The Walker ad features the silhouettes of two people sounding out the words "property," "income" and "gas" to argue they will all go up under Evers.

Evers has not unveiled tax or road plans, but he's said "anything is on the table." ...
